

The Most Scary Experience

Probing fear

My redoubtable friend Solus “Sol” Simkin wandered into my office late one afternoon and asked me, “What is the most scary experience for a human being?”

I thought for an instant as I replied, almost reflexively, “Death. What else? Or a close shave with death.”

The hard taskmaster that he is, Sol told me to think again. He told me to imagine something that pursues one’s days and nights like a relentless shadow. A fear with no respite. Not the fear of encountering a cobra that wears out in half an hour at most. Not the fear of a narrowly missed road accident that leaves one rattled and shivering for a full five minutes. No, this was a shoreless fear. And nothing supernatural. It is a fear as mundane as the Earth and yet, it is a fear that we do not normally encounter, let alone experience. But when recognized and felt, it was a fear that chilled the spine and shook one’s very core.

“Sol,” I said. What you are asking me to probe calls for long, deep, and hard thought. I need more time”.

I had hastily tried to assemble a quick list of scary tales from H H Munro’s Shredni Vashtar, to H P Lovecraft’s The Call of Cthulhu. Then there was The Arbor House Treasury of Horror and the Supernatural that engrossed me for many days and nights with its eclectic collection of terrifying tales, but none of them had left me a helpless heap of jelly, paralyzed with fear. Then I remembered my one of my favourite authors, Edgar Allan Poe, and his Tales of Mystery and Imagination, surely among the choicest morsels of the macabre. The injection of fear from these stories had been swift and intense, but not long-lasting. Even the movie, The Shining, based on angst-meister Stephen King’s novel of the same name, had been able to terrify me, but fleetingly.

“Take your time, and wend your way slowly through the labyrinth of your own memories and pluck for me that single, shiny nugget of fear that dazzles you even today, its power to enchant, enthrall and engulf, undiminished by the passage of time,” Sol told me soothingly. “I have a reason for asking you to undertake this introspection. I had my own close brush with depthless fear recently. What I learned from it was unusual to say the least. I wish to discuss it with you. So, when you are ready, we will discuss it in the relaxing ambiance of our favourite coffee hangout. Mind you, be prepared for many sessions before the denouement takes place.”

“Why is the word ‘hope’ magic?” asked the youngest camel, stretching out one stiff leg to see if it still could move. And now Mohammed’s son lifted the little camel’s head up again and laid it against his shoulder while he shook the remaining cords away. When he did this, the little camel saw that he was young and very handsome. He was wearing a silk turban with pearls and turquoises embroidered on it, and carved gold ornaments[35] hung from his ears, and there was a look of great gentleness in his face.

“Well, you see, h stands for ‘help,’ and o stands for ‘O,’ and p stands for ‘power,’ and e stands for ‘eternal,’” he said so lightly and merrily that he seemed to be making fun of something. He took out a little ivory flask from his garments and poured some fresh water between the little camel’s burning lips. “So when you say ‘hope’ like that, you’re really saying ‘Help, O power eternal!’ And that means me because I’ve been appointed your patron saint this year.”
